An Ode to My Mentors

THE 2 ATTORNEYS WHO TAUGHT ME HOW TO PRACTICE

I've had quite a few teachers and mentors in my life. Regular readers of this newsletter will know that my grandparents were pivotal figures in my life, but there are others who also shaped me into the person I am today. On May 4, we will celebrate National Teachers Day, and I can think of no one else who has taught me as much professionally as two of my mentors, Mark DeJoie and Mario Capano.

I met Mark and Mario when I was still a young law student. They were friends with Jill's uncle, and that connection allowed me to gain experience in a law firm while going to school. Like any law student, I was exhausted. I would spend my mornings at the law firm working as a legal assistant, catch the train for Boston to attend law school, then take the train home to go work at a computer store at night. When I could, I would go to Jill's house to see her, too, before going home to crash in bed.

Yet, that exhaustion was worth it.

I learned so much from Mario and Mark, and they set the trajectory for the rest of my career. Mario is a family law and divorce attorney, while Mark handled homeowner and contractor disputes and landlord and tenant issues while running a non-profit company at the same time. I still wasn't sure if I wanted to practice in those areas, find another area of expertise, or go into Boston and work at a large firm to "gain my sea legs."

Then, I watched Mario and Mark. They were hardworking attorneys who were committed to their cases, but they always made time for their families. They had created a firm that guided their clients while also ensuring that they could be home in time for dinner or at a soccer tournament the next weekend. Law students often hear horror stories of attorneys working long hours with little respite, but Mario and Mark proved you could be effective and compassionate for your clients and be just as dedicated to your family.

New State, Same Commitment

Starting April 1, Monteforte Law will be able to practice estate planning and elder law in New Hampshire! Please share this news with your New Hampshire friends and family who may need guidance.

As I worked at the firm, I realized that's exactly what I wanted. They instilled in me the confidence I needed to go out and create my own law firm. They taught me what law school didn't. I learned how to deal with employees and navigate insurance, but more importantly, I learned how to balance work and home.

After law school, I spent time in Mario and Mark's firm doing real estate law, and by that time, Mario and Mark had become my good friends, too. They gave me a really nice pen for graduation that still sits on my desk today, and I have fond memories of helping them engage with their communities. (I learned the value of a community from them, too. It's why I've always lived and worked within or very close to Wilmington.)

Today, Mario, Mark, and I remain close. They send clients to me when my expertise in elder law is justified, and I do the same for them. I even learned that two of Mario's kids are now lawyers, and I feel old! I remember helping Mario build one of their Christmas presents years ago! It's hard to believe we have a connection that goes back that far.

Just a few months ago, Mario came by to see our new office space, and he commented on how impressed he was. It was a gratifying moment. To have a man who was — and in many ways still is — my mentor give me a compliment like that made me proud of how far I've come. From that exhausted kid just trying to graduate law school to practicing law the way that works best for me, I know that some of the credit for who I am today goes to Mario and Mark. And I will always be grateful for their guidance.

Bring Spring Indoors

The Most Beautiful May Flowers for Your Home or Office

The April showers came and went, so now we get to enjoy May flowers! You might not buy flowers for yourself often, but it's totally worth treating yourself and your visitors, all while supporting your local florist!

To start off, anemones are the most mythological May plant around because of two famous Greek myths surrounding these jewel-toned flowers. Anemones are said to have sprung from blood shed by the death of Aphrodite's lover, Adonis. The ancient Greeks also believed that the god of the west wind favored anemones — hence their second name, the windflower.

Attach them as pops of color to any bouquet for a classic, romantic, or modern arrangement, or mix them with roses and trailing greenery for a more boho look.

Carnations are also fantastic flowers to display in May. Some people may see carnations as a cheap flower, but, when used en masse, they can have a truly breathtaking effect in a room. Try using natural-colored carnations to create a fresh, contemporary space.

You can also freshen up the room with sweet peas, which have a wonderfully mild perfume. They come with an enormous range of colors — one of the biggest ranges in the flora kingdom, in fact!

Delicate, ruffled, and feminine, sweet peas are sure to delight anyone who sees them.

Lastly, although tulips or orchids would be classic choices for your arrangement, consider surprising your visitors with lilies of the valley. These beautiful, peaceful little blooms only grow in white, which is often seen as the color of renewal and innocence, and they wear it well! Their adorable little bell-like flowers will be sure to put a smile on your face.

We hope you will consider these gorgeous flowers for your space this year. A small purchase at your local small businesses can make a big difference, just like how a few flowers can make a big difference in your home!

The 3 Strangest Celebrity Lawsuits

Stories about celebrities can be enjoyable or awkward, but no matter what happens, they usually create great material for BuzzFeed or Reddit users. This also includes celebrity stories involving the law, which bring on a lot of head-scratching and legal action — like these three strange cases.

Simon Cowell pays for a chef's disappearing shoes.

Known for his unrelenting critiques and setting the stage for some of the world's biggest names in show business, Simon Cowell has amassed enough wealth to afford a private chef. When one such chef came by his house for a job interview, she was asked to remove her shoes, but according to court documents, she never received her shoes back. The chef claims to have tried multiple times to retrieve the shoes — which were outfitted with $500 orthopedic insoles — but never succeeded. She sued Cowell for the shoes and gas money, and the "America's Got Talent" star shelled out.

Internet conspiracy theory results in a court case against Beyoncé.

The internet is a wild place, and conspiracy theories are often born on its digital channels. One such theory was that Beyoncé and her husband, Jay-Z, hired a surrogate to give birth to their daughter, Blue Ivy, in 2012. Internet trolls who saw her pregnant belly roll as she sat down for an interview fanned the flames of this theory, and soon, a lawsuit emerged. A woman claimed she was the true biological mother of Blue Ivy, and she asked for compensation and DNA testing to prove it. Previously, the same woman claimed to be the birth mother of North West, the daughter of Kim Kardashian and Kanye West, but the court threw out the case.

Mila Kunis ruffles some feathers.

Actress Mila Kunis was sued for $5,000 by her childhood friend, Kristina Karo, in 2015 because Kunis allegedly stole a chicken from Karo when they were still children in Ukraine. Karo, an aspiring singer, claimed the theft resulted in extreme emotional distress and prevented her from pursuing the American dream. According to Kunis, the theft occurred when she was 7 years old and Karo was just 1 month old. Kunis and her husband, actor Ashton Kutcher, speculated that the case was all a publicity stunt to promote Karo's upcoming music video, and the case was eventually dropped.

WILL EUROPE BE ABLE TO PAY ITS $3.2T PANDEMIC DEBT?

Millions of families in Europe have relied heavily on government aid for survival, but that's becoming a concern for the younger generation. European debt hasn't been so high since World War II, and it's even outpacing national economies. In France alone, the national debt has risen to 2.7 trillion euros ($3.2 trillion) and will soon exceed 120% of the national economy.

While the International Monetary Fund expects growth to bounce back this year to 5.1% in the United States, Europe will likely lag with a rebound of 4.2%.

Yet, as debts skyrocket, economists wonder if it's possible for Europe to get a "free lunch."

In the current zero-interest era, strange things are happening. Although the amount of debt companies have taken has grown, the amount that governments pay hasn't. Countries can now roll over their debt at low interest rates, which is akin to refinancing a mortgage. Banks are also buying government debt, effectively lending around 1.3 trillion euros during the first six months of the pandemic.

This makes the debt affordable — for now. Government debt may never have to be fully paid back if central banks keep buying it up. According to the Institut Montaigne, an independent think tank in Paris, public debt could rise to 4 trillion by the end of 2023.

Some economists are worried about the risks. What if inflation and interest rates help revive growth too rapidly, forcing central banks to put a complete stop to their easy-money policies? Weaker countries may fall into a debt trap and struggle to pay. Simon Tilford, director of a strategic planning firm in London, told the New York Times, "If inflation starts to return but there's no growth, then the situation gets a lot trickier."

When the next recession rolls around, it may be tough to stimulate their economy with this amount of debt on their hands. This worries the younger generation of Europeans, but at least for now, those troubles seem far away in the eyes of those steering European economies through the pandemic.

- 4 Influencer in Florida Accused of Voter Fraud

Influencer in Florida Accused of Voter Fraud

A February 2016 analysis by MIT Media Lab revealed that Twitter account “Ricky Vaughn” was the 107th most important influencer in the then-upcoming election. That’s a higher ranking than many other groups and individuals like NBC News (114), Stephen Colbert (119), and Newt Gingrich (141). Everyone had one question: Who in the world is Ricky Vaughn?

As it turns out, the Florida man was really stepping up his game. Douglass Mackey, aka Ricky Vaughn, is based in West Palm Beach and gained an audience on Twitter with over 58,000 followers by 2016. Many would describe him as an internet troll, or someone who posts hurtful comments for his own amusement. He’s posted anti-Semitic memes in the past, though, those offenses were hardly illegal. That changed when Mackey allegedly went too far.

Using hashtags like #go[candidate], Mackey posted false, edited campaign images to convince people to “vote” by text instead of going to the polls or using the mail-in ballot. In one instance, he posted an image depicting an African American woman holding a sign, reading “African Americans for [candidate].” The images would then include instructions on how to vote by texting a specific number. Mackey and his associates also created images with Spanish instructions, obviously targeting minorities as well.

Of course, voting by text is not a legitimate way to cast a ballot, yet the deceptive campaign duped over 4,900 unique phone numbers. William F. Sweeney Jr., assistant director in charge of the FBI’s New York Field Office, reported in their press release, “Protecting every American citizen’s right to cast a legitimate vote is a key to the success of our republic. What Mackey allegedly did to interfere with this process — by soliciting voters to cast their ballots via text — amounted to nothing short of vote theft.”

It’s certainly fascinating and terrifying to see just how influential social media can be on an election and even go as far as to lure people into wasting their vote. We’re glad, however, to see these types of cases being brought to court — Mackey was recently arrested on federal charges of election interference for this 2016 voter disinformation campaign. Some influencers are taking their title much too seriously!
