The Last Season (and a Whole Lot of Pride)

Knowing the End Is Coming and Loving Every Inning Anyway

This spring feels different in a way I wasn't prepared for.

Mikey is heading into his college baseball season knowing it will be his last one ever. He's graduating a semester early, which means when the season ends, baseball ends with it. No more next year. No more "one more run." Just ... done. I'll admit, I haven't fully processed that yet. I'm not sure I even want to.

He's been a catcher since he was 6 years old. If you've ever known a catcher, you know that position chooses you as much as you choose it. It's demanding, physical, unglamorous, and mentally exhausting. You're in every play. You take the hits. You carry the weight of the game in ways most people never notice. And from the very beginning, the role fit him.

Baseball hasn't just been something Mikey played. It's been part of his identity for most of his life. Our family calendar revolved around it, with early mornings, late nights, long weekends, and more miles on the car than I care to count.

Practices in the heat. Games in the cold. Rain delays, doubleheaders, and quiet rides home after tough losses. Those moments shape you. They shape families.

Last season was a big one. He hit over .300, and anyone who knows baseball understands what that really means: consistency, discipline, and confidence at the plate. But what makes me proud isn't the stat line. It's the path that got him there. There were plenty of moments along the way where people doubted him. Times when others didn't see the potential, didn't think he'd break through, and didn't expect the success he's had.

Mikey never made excuses. He just worked. He showed up early. He stayed late. He trusted the process. And year after year, he proved people wrong the only way that really matters, by performing.

What makes this even more special is that he's done all of this while thriving academically. He's graduating early, doing extremely well in school, and already planning for what comes next: law school. That transition doesn't worry me at all. I have no doubt he'll succeed in whatever he chooses to do. The same traits that made him successful on the field, preparation, resilience, and focus, will serve him just as well in the classroom and beyond.

If I'm being honest, the harder adjustment will be mine.

There is something almost impossible to describe about watching your kid walk onto the field. Seeing him put on the gear. Watching him crouch behind the plate, mask on, fully locked in. For a few hours, nothing else matters. The pride you feel in those moments is overwhelming. And knowing those moments are now finite, numbered, makes every single one feel heavier.

Baseball has been such a constant in his life, and in ours, that imagining a future without it feels strange. It will be a big change for him, but an even bigger one for me. I'll miss the games. I'll miss the routine. I'll miss the quiet sense of awe that comes from watching your child do something he loves at a high level.

I also find myself thinking a lot about my grandfather. He would be incredibly proud. I know he's looking down right now, watching this final season unfold, smiling at the young man Mikey has become. That thought grounds me. It reminds me that this isn't really an ending but a milestone.

So, this season, I'm soaking it all in. Every inning. Every at-bat. Every moment in the stands when I get to sit back and think, This is special. Don't rush it.

Baseball may be coming to a close, but the journey has been extraordinary. And as much as I'm not ready for it to end, I couldn't be prouder of the way he's finishing: strong, confident, and ready for whatever comes next.

DIGITAL DANGERS

AI'S HIDDEN RISKS TO CONSUMERS

If you've been to an airport lately, you likely have posed for a facial recognition camera before entering your security checkpoint. This technology is just one example of how artificial intelligence (AI) is being used to not only identify who we are, but also learn more about us than we might realize.

In some cases, this reality is not a great thing.

Sure, being tracked online by AI may be considered beneficial by consumers who don't mind receiving alerts on new purchasing opportunities based on their past shopping habits. However, society's growing dependency on this level of technology is problematic when it leads to innocent people being incarcerated on false charges. Here's a look at some of the growing risks surrounding the use of AI ... and what you can do to better protect your privacy and rights from the prying eyes of emerging technology.

Amazon's Data Defect Debacle

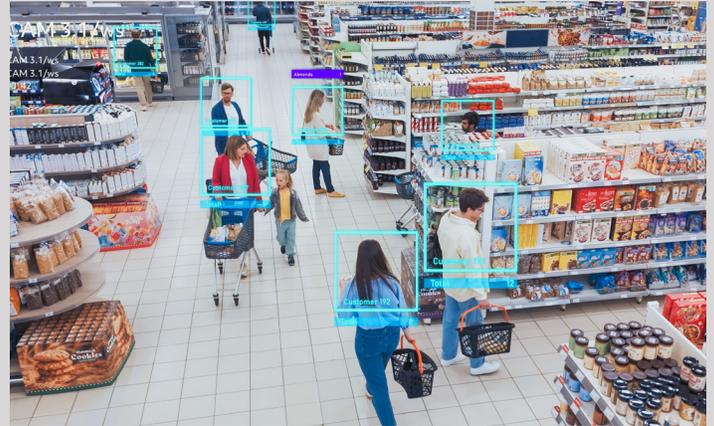

Although AI is seemingly everywhere these days, its use in the corporate world has existed for some time ... and has created considerable gaffes along the way.

Amazon learned about machine learning's potential missteps the hard way. As far back as 2015, the company discovered that its AI-generated tools for screening resumes were biased against female job candidates. The system, designed to assign a rating from one to five stars to each applicant, gave lower scores to women who had applied for technical positions. The reason? The system had been trained to review and recommend candidates based on trends identified in resumes submitted to the company over the past 10 years, a period when men dominated the majority of positions.

Instead of advancing future AI technology, Amazon stumbled back into America's cultural past, creating a PR nightmare and raising serious questions about the potential long-term harm AI could cause in efforts to promote gender equality.

“When faulty tech threatens a person's liberty, it's clear that AI's road to perfection still has plenty of potholes.”

AI's Misadventures in Faulty Arrests

Facial recognition technology may be all the rage at airports, but the same can't be said for its use at police stations. According to research conducted by the National Institute of Standards and Technology, Asian and African Americans are up to twice as likely to be misidentified by facial recognition as Caucasians. This discrepancy has real-world consequences, including the 2023 arrest of a pregnant woman in Detroit who was charged with carjacking after AI technology mistook her for someone else. When faulty tech threatens a person's liberty, it's clear that AI's road to perfection still has plenty of potholes.

Consumers' Best Practices for Data Privacy

Naturally, everyday consumers may also find themselves in sticky situations as a result of AI's still-imperfect processes. Banking giant JPMorgan Chase offers the following suggestions to help better protect your personal information from AI-driven data tracking:

- Utilize a separate, dedicated email address when engaging with AI chatbots, and avoid using the same email associated with your banking or social media.
- Log off after every AI chat session to help ensure the system is not tracking your subsequent online usage.
- Use only generative AI platforms available through the Google and Apple App stores and other reputable sources.

AI may be a fascinating new chapter in our technical evolution, but it's not without causes for concern. Whether you're ordering shoes online or checking your savings account, forewarned is forearmed when it comes to guarding your identity ... and even your freedom.

FROM COOKIE JARS TO CAR KEYS

Building Responsibility in Kids and Teens

If you've ever walked into your kitchen to discover your child's mouth covered in chocolate while they insist they didn't dip into the cookie jar before dinner, you know the importance of teaching little ones about being honest and taking responsibility for their actions. Here are a few tips for incorporating age-appropriate lessons on accountability into a child's daily routine.

Pathways to Responsible Preschoolers

When teaching children the value of personal accountability, selecting tasks that match their abilities and level of understanding is essential. For children ages 3–6, this could mean having them take responsibility for setting the table (with supervision as needed to ensure safety with utensils and glassware), feeding their pets, or putting away their toys neatly after they finish playing with them.

If they struggle or fail to fulfill a particular responsibility, use it as an opportunity for growth, rather than a reason to ground them. For example, if they forget to feed their dog or cat, show them their pet's signs of hunger ... and remind your child of how sad, tired, and cranky they would feel if they were hungry and had to wait a long time to eat. If they forget to pick up their LEGOs, remind them of how much it hurt the last time they stepped on a piece when they weren't wearing shoes. Above all, be sure to maintain a positive atmosphere and praise them whenever they complete a task (especially when they do it without being asked!) or put in their best effort to do so.

Guidance for Goal-Driven Teens

If your child has passed the age of picking up building blocks, you can help them manage and fulfill their pre-adult responsibilities. Encourage them to budget their spending money (especially once they start working for the first time), take an active role in maintaining their vehicle, and coordinate their own schedules for after-school or social activities.

While it's always wise to be available to help if or when they run out of gas or sleep through their alarm, giving them space to be more independent (and occasionally make mistakes) will go a long way in teaching them the real-world rewards and consequences of how they handle their responsibilities.

By giving children room to learn, try, and even stumble, we help them build the confidence and character they'll carry into adulthood. With steady guidance and age-appropriate responsibilities, accountability becomes a lifelong habit.

BUMPER BETRAYAL

INSIDE UBER'S RACKETEERING RESPONSE

It's a devious enough scam to make Tony Soprano blush.

Imagine orchestrating a series of intentional automobile collisions with the sole purpose of suing Uber for the recovery of car repair costs and medical expenses. This outrageous scenario is at the heart of the ride-share company's 97-page lawsuit against a Florida attorney who it claims paid people to crash into each other to instigate fraudulent suits and attempt to rake in millions.

Filed in Miami last June, Uber's suit alleges that personal injury attorney Andy Loynaz, co-founder of the firm Law Group of South Florida, compensated drivers to stage accidents and later claim they were using the Uber app at the time. According to the complaint, these bogus bang-ups occurred near Hialeah, Florida, in 2023 and 2024, with Loynaz submitting $1 million insurance claims for each one and later suing Uber and its insurance carrier in four separate cases. Additionally, he allegedly coaxed representatives from Miami's River Medical Center, area auto body shops, and other medical clinics to falsely claim the accident had caused injuries and property damage requiring care and repairs.

Uber, which claims to have already spent millions defending itself against Loynaz's suits, is suing the attorney under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. If he loses the suit, Loynaz may be subject to treble damages and attorneys' fees.

Interestingly, the case of the potentially crooked lawyer and his band of allegedly corrupt cronies is far from the only litigation of its kind. Earlier in 2025, Uber filed a suit in New York, alleging that another group of lawyers, medical providers, and clinics was carrying out a similar scheme in the Empire State.

No matter how successful Uber's battle against this level of fraud may be, the amount of allegedly criminal conniving taking place in Florida and New York is enough to make the most hardened mobster raise an eyebrow ... and perhaps demand a cut.
